From the moment Bart Bradshaw was old enough to walk, he had begun to tinker with anything he could get his hands on. By early childhood, while other kids might have been disassembling toys or perhaps even watches, Bart had advanced to holovids and other electronics. By his early teenage years he was attacking hovercars, not only taking them apart but putting them back together better than before. As he was raised in a loving home, we cannot determine what caused him to choose his current path, but by the time he was sixteen he'd already been in jail for auto theft and vehicular vandalism. There is also strong evidence – though he was never convicted – that he murdered a girlfriend. Upon his release, he quickly found himself hip deep in small-time organized crime on his birth world. An invaluable asset to any organization due to his unmatched electrical expertise, he was rewarded with his only real desire in life: learning how to pilot a 'Mech.

Having cycled through several worlds on various crime-related jobs, it was only natural for him to join The Scourge of Bannson's Raiders.

Bart Bradshaw simply cannot believe his luck. Not only is he finally piloting a BattleMech, but his current ride is a brand-new Clan design, newly off the assembly line in the Nova Cat enclave in the Draconis Combine. Its significant firepower and long range more than make up for its speed, relatively slow for a 'Mech its size. He's named it "Fister."
Though he is not about to ask any questions – you don't ask questions in The Scourge, and he's not about to lose his ride due to an "oversight" – he has to wonder where the design came from. It may add credence to the rumors he's heard that Bannson controls an extensive black market that reaches out into almost every faction, even to the Clans themselves.
